John Sloan was born in the small lumbering town of Lock Haven, Pa., and educated in Philadelphia. His Scotch father came from a long line of cabinet-makers who settled in America early in the eighteenth century. His mother was of English stock, from a family of manufacturers and educators which took pride in their famous cousin, Joseph Priestley. As a child, Sloan learned to appreciate good literature, science and art, when he visited the library of the old scholar-inventor, his great-uncle Alexander Priestley. A natural student, Sloan's formal education was interrupted at the age of sixteen when he had to leave school to help support his family. Until the age of thirty he worked six days a week as a designer and illustrator. Meanwhile, he had been encouraged by Robert Henri to start making pictures of the American life around him — pictures with a kind of poetic realism inspired by Whitman's vision and in the tradition of Goya, Daumier, Manet.

The Armory Show stimulated Sloan's thoughtful mind to study the significant form in all art, from the classic to the primitive. But he always put his interest in life and the dignity of human beings before his concern with aesthetics. As he had been independent of the art for art's sake movement in the nineties (Whistler and the other expatriates), so he stood firm in the development of his own vision when abstract art became fashionable. But he did not enforce his own point of view on students, and all his life worked on exhibitions which gave opportunity for showing creative work of every kind. As President of the Society of Independent Artists and a teacher at the Art Students League, he encouraged the talents of artists as different from himself as Stuart Davis and Alexander Calder.

This exhibition is a cross-section of Sloan's graphic work, from the Poster Style newspaper drawings (now recognized as part of the Art Nouveau period) to strongly realized charcoal drawings made in the last years. At the age of seventeen he had taught himself to etch, first copying a portrait by Rembrandt, the artist he always respected as the greatest draughtsman and humanist.
