Foreword

The present exhibition is composed of original works by three American artists who have made a significant contribution to the graphic arts media. Of these, Armin Landeck and Stow Wengenroth are still living; Reginald Marsh died in 1954 at the age of 56.

In observing the items included in this exhibition, one is struck by the personal quality to be found in the works of the artists represented. This pertains both to the individual artist's choice of subject matter and the method used in projecting it.

In the prints by Landeck, the subject is generally of buildings or landscapes completely devoid of animals or humans, the artist's fundamental interest being to project these in an intricate and highly organized relationship of orchestrated line work. In Marsh's prints one finds a wide range of subject matter with the human figure in action as the dominating factor; the main source of this material to be found in the Metropolitan area. These are projected with great gusto and a vital characterization of the subjects involved. Wengenroth's drawings and prints are based on this artist's realistic concept of Nature in which the creative emphasis, regardless of the subject, be it the portrayal of rocks, sea, forest, buildings or birds, the sense of quietude and calmness prevails.
