FOREWORD

The Art Students' League is not a conventional educational institution. It has no entrance requirements, it has no prescribed courses of study, it grants no diplomas, it has no compulsory attendance.

The organization and pattern of the League was not premeditated. It evolved naturally from its beginning. In the Spring of 1875 the National Academy announced that it would not reopen its school the following autumn because of lack of funds. The students of Professor Lemuel E. Wilmarth wanted to continue their studies. So at the suggestion of Professor Wilmarth the students met and founded the Art Students League. From among themselves they selected a Board of Control. All the concerns of the group were put in charge of this Board. On its Board of Control there are no well-meaning citizens to assume any deficit of operation, the Board being limited to artists who are or were students of the League, and board members cannot receive compensation from the League or employment during their tenure of office.

The League believes that only artists can teach artists and it employs as instructors those who have achieved eminence in their field. No one in the League may interfere with the method an instructor employs in his classroom or with the way in which he conducts his class. This complete freedom has produced teachers of national reputation and their many students are in the forefront of American art today and have been for the past seventy years. Some of the names of these great teachers are Kenyon Cox, William M. Chase, Thomas Eakins, Frank V. DuMond, Kenneth H. Miller, Robert Henri, John Sloan, Boardman Robinson, Morris Kantor, George Grosz, William Zorach, Hans Hofmann, Yasuo Kuniyoshi, Reginald Marsh. There are many others, and it is due to these factors, that over the years, the League has been recognized as being one of the foremost Art Schools to be found in the United States.
